Deciding what you want to do You can become an expert on Photoshop by studying all of the programs' features. However, once you think you've learned enough, you can further your photographic skills with your own creativity and technical prowess. If you've mastered a dozen or so Photoshop features, the following sections can help you decide how to use them. This doesn't imply that they're the only ways to use Photoshop, but they can help you use Photoshop efficiently. You may find that you develop a workflow based on one or more of the following strategies: * Use a traditional workflow * Use a hybrid workflow *

Embrace the "there are as many ways to do it as there are photographers" (JWT) principle You can also choose to jump in head first and take a shot-by-shot approach as you experiment with Photoshop, trying to master the program and learn it inside out so that you can use it without thinking about it. Photoshop is one of the most popular programs in the world. It is so popular that people run it without any special hardware requirements and with software running on computers many years old. There are other alternatives to Photoshop: GIMP,

It is possible to create images with Photoshop with just the mouse or even a finger. Photos can be cropped, and the size of the image can be changed. It is possible to create 3D images and add special effects. The support for different file formats and different file structures makes it easy to work with images. For example, you can open an image (from an original photo or from a photo editing software), set the appropriate size and resolution, use a bunch of editing tools to make your photo look as you want it to look, and export the resulting image as a photo in any of your favorite file formats. You can use your photos in different ways. For example, you can print your photos and frame them in different sizes and even write your own captions for them. You can try the demo version of Photoshop for a free one week trial. After the trial period, you can use the full version of Photoshop for any number of computer usage hours. The program isn't free, but the price of the license is very reasonable.
