A case of recurrent papilloma of the anal canal in a 19-year-old woman is described. The patient had suffered from constipation and anal bleeding for 3 years. A small papilloma was detected by endoscopic examination. After surgical removal, the patient's condition gradually deteriorated. Excisional biopsy was then performed. No lesion was found in the specimen, and the patient's condition improved. In the biopsy specimens, the overlying surface epithelium was positive for p53 protein. P53 protein is known to be an essential factor for the development of anal papilloma. Thus, the cause of recurrence and deterioration of the patient's condition may have been that the p53 factor was present even in the epithelium over the lesion. This possibility may provide insight into a strategy for preventing recurrence of this disease.
