* The Photoshop Web site (www.adobe.com/products/photoshop.html) has up-to-date information on Photoshop, as well as a gallery of PSDs (Photoshop files) that show the diverse applications of Photoshop. * The Photoshop user community is rather active, with Photoshop Central at www.photoshopcentral.com and the Adobe User Experience (UE) magazine available on Adobe's Web site. * You can also find tutorials on Photoshop at numerous online resources. What's a good place to start? Click here for a list. * * * # Photoshop versus Premiere Pro Adobe Premiere Pro is still Adobe's professional photo editing software, though it's pretty capable of editing a number of other media types. When deciding between Adobe's products, keep in mind the market you're interested in. If you know a little about other image editing programs and how to work with them, you can probably use Premiere Pro rather easily. If you need more flexibility and already work in Photoshop, you may find that Photoshop is the most effective program for your work. * * * ## Adding Text to Your Photos With text, a "semi-retouching" step is pretty much all that's needed. In some cases, you can remove a word or two, but you'd be hard-pressed to add a single word, and the results are rarely anything good. In this section, we give you some good basic resources for adding text, and then we discuss how you can get even more control and fun with your results. A number of free online services are available to add text to your images. Check out the What Type of Labeling? sidebar earlier in this chapter for more on this topic.

The glucocorticoid receptor is a target for eicosanoid synthesis and action. The glucocorticoid receptor (GR) is one of the most important targets for eicosanoids during inflammation. In addition to its expression in inflammatory cells and epithelial cells, GR is also present in the cytosol of non-immune cells such as fibroblasts and astrocytes. Here, we show that the epidermal growth factor (EGF) increases the association of GR with the nuclear transport proteins importin-alpha and importin-beta as well as increases its transcriptional activity in fibroblasts. An important part of this mechanism is the EGF-induced generation of EGF-like epimeric PGE2 via the pathway of COX-2 induction. This involves a role of cAMP/PKA but not ERK MAPK in stimulating COX-2 activity in fibroblasts. Importantly, GR expression was markedly increased in the astrocytes after PGE2 treatment, both in gene and protein expression. In addition, in the presence of a GR antagonist (GRalpha-I) the cytotoxic effects of PGE2 were reduced in the astrocytes. Together, these data indicate that PGE2 and GR, likely expressed in astrocytes, are linked to eicosanoid synthesis and bioactivity as well as GR function. As the GR target represents a part of the pathophysiology of many chronic inflammatory diseases, the effect of PGE2 on GR expression in astrocytes might be of relevance for the understanding of the development of astrogliosis in disorders such as Huntington's disease or Alzheimer's disease.
