Ask HN: Whats missing in the webapp market? - candre717 Hi All,I'm a web designer (recently completed 3 years in lawschool after a startup) and have recently been rethinking my direction in life after working my a$$ off to achieve my goal. I have a strong idea for a web app and I'm now considering going about it as a one off on a private project rather than pursuing another startup.I know that we have a couple of pretty impressive webapps here on HN but nothing hugely revolutionary. I just wondered what people were missing in the webapp market. I'm a big fan of Arc for now but the focus seems to be on workflows rather than a straight out client app. We have a couple of nice web sites and mobile apps but nothing at all in the webapp market. ====== davidroetzel Hi. I haven't thought about this much, but what I can say is that it's important for your app to be useful, because users (in my experience) will look at your website and then click the only button they see. User experience is crucial. You can do tons of stuff with a website, but if you don't provide a good and easy to use experience for your users, there is no point in creating a web app. Detection and characterization of anti-mast cell prealbumin antibodies in the rat. A rat prealbumin specific antiserum, raised against a synthetic peptide corresponding to amino acids 176 to 186 of the rat prealbumin was found to bind to granules in the peritoneal mast cell population. Pre-incubation of the test sample with the peptide, blocked the binding of the antiserum to the granules. The antiserum reacted with the prealbumin on SDS polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis and Western blotting. The specificity of the antiserum, as determined by competition experiments, was prealbumin specific. The antiserum was used to screen a pool of sera from rats which had received lipopolysaccharide injection and from control rats for prealbumin. Using two-dimensional gel electrophoresis, one sera recognized a 39,000 dalton protein, corresponding to prealbumin. This sera was characterized by high activity on Western blotting. In Western blots of rat sera and the Ig
