E-mailing your photos Sending photos to a friend or relative on the other side of the world by e-mail (or other means) is a good way to share your work. You can do this with a number of image sharing sites, including Flickr (), Shutterstocks (), and SmugMug (), which also makes a print-on-demand service so that you can print your own copies (and order prints for you as well). Finding software to organize your photos You don't need to download and install any additional software to organize your photos. There are plenty of image processing tools already on your computer or online. All you need to do is download them and configure them properly. Because you can end up with thousands of images, you may need a folder or tool that can hold thousands of photos. You can organize photos using commercial software, such as CyberLink's PhotoDirector, but also you can use a variety of free file management programs. From the variety of free programs out there, you have to decide which one suits you best. Perhaps you have a favorite photo organizing program, or maybe you're more comfortable with a couple of different programs and just use one or two. With image editing software, you can make your photos look better. The programs enable you to crop, retouch, and filter photos. Some software has an interesting and intelligent selection tool. Organizing photos To organize your photos, you can use a computer, a notebook, or even a list in a paper notebook. You can even use a numbered index card, something I do, as I use this method for very large sets of photos. The method of organizing that works best for me is to put each photo into a separate folder and label it with a number. The labels should correspond to the date that the photo was shot. You can access your photos in this format using a number of digital photo file management programs, such as Apple

News Latest news Given the timing, and with LESA's contract coming up for renewal next summer, LESA kept its promise to temporarily pause its effectiveness until the new benefits contract was finalized. To this end, the PEF has changed its structure so that the two programs share two administrators and a board. The board of directors had a chance to do some deep-diving and found that the overhead was too high. This is somewhat understandable, since a major component of the PEF is grants from the National Social Security Fund (SCB) which is a state agency. LESA is part of the state agency as well, but the SCB takes up less space and is more efficient. Q: Loading JQuery Functions in ajax Header This should be a quick yes or no question, but it's bugging me, and I don't know how to ask the question properly. I'm actually using a script that will add an id to all anchors on the page via an Ajax. Basicly, I have: `$(function(){ $('a').click(function(){ $('#anroid-container').load($(this).attr('href')); return false; }); });` Here is what I'm a little concerned about: At the end of the script, I have a self-closing script tag: But what happens is when this script finishes, everything that occurs under the script is going to be JQuery loaded, so I'm afraid that all the functions within the script are going to be loaded at the same time... Is this a bad thing? I know it's safe to put functions as a script tag, but I was just curious if this would ever cause problems with other scripts or what not... So please tell me if this is a problem and also, if this is a problem, what is a proper way to do this? Thanks! A: You could use the `load()` method to manually asynchronously load scripts, but it doesn't sound like you need it for anything other than AJAX content. Then, within your script tag, you just do what any browser would do to load script elements `function add_anroid_container() { $("").appendTo('#anroid-container'); }` Then load what you need with your AJAX call. You may want to store the function in a variable and call it later, in case you need to add other things later. You could also just call it with the AJAX call if the container was already present (this would be called an error-safe script load). For example: `add_anroid_container = function() { $('`
