Story highlights 10 women have been killed in the Rio Grande, family says United Nations says it will investigate extrajudicial killings Corps of Engineers say water is flowing downstream The Rio Grande, the river that bisects South and Central America, flows into Mexico through the U.S. and becomes a muddy pool of gloom and despair. The river has been painted a deep blue and green because of enormous cornfields and tobacco fields that line the banks of its meandering way. Thousands of people have died and been displaced by floods and poor planning by the government. But some recent news stories may illuminate the harsh dimensions of that infamous river. Ten women were killed in the Rio Grande during the first weekend of December, a fact that baffled local authorities, relatives and international human rights organizations, including the United Nations. The agency that controls the river, the U.S. Department of the Army, said it had done no such thing. CORPS OF ENGINEERS SAYS DROUGHT LEADS TO DELUGE IN MEXICO "There was no body count, no announcement of a body count of any kind," said Steve Earley, chief spokesman for the Corps of Engineers, as he sat in a conference room at the agency's headquarters in Virginia. Earley said the agency received a call from the press office at the Geneva-based United Nations and immediately began looking into the matter. The United Nations announced Thursday that it will launch an investigation of possible extrajudicial killings of some 70 people who may have been victims of "inhuman or degrading treatment and punishment" by Mexican officials. The agency, which monitors human rights violations in Mexico, said that 10 women were killed in the first week of the month on the U.S. side of the river. The wife of a U.S. Border Patrol agent was one of them. Wallace Ortiz, a 64-year-old rancher who owns several cattle ranches near McAllen, Texas, said that on Sunday his 14-year-old son saw some Mexican women on a dirt road near a fenced-in area. They were dead. EARLEY ADDRESSES BORDER CRISIS IN NEWSPEECH "He said, "What was that?" Ortiz said in Spanish. Ortiz said that his son saw two bodies at the fenced-in area and then learned that five more were
