declare `getOwnPropertyNames()` to work for Js objects? I need to check the properties of my JS object to see if some of them are functions, and if so return the names of those functions in an array. But, when I do so, it appears to be getting the property names of my object, and not the object itself, so I end up with an array of the names of the object, not the names of the methods. My object is as follows: `var table = { id: 999, title: "", name: "", myFunction: function(){ // } }` I then try to use `getOwnPropertyNames` to get the names of my functions, so I can use them later in another function, like so: `var getPropNames = Object.getOwnPropertyNames(table) //` this is what I'm doing

Semispheres, a game by Bylin Games, is a sci-fi logic puzzle platformer, full of both story and brainteasers. It is the result of a two year quest to create a new genre: the logic puzzle platformer. In the end, it was a very interesting and somewhat frustrating journey, but one I'm proud of. It is one of those special games that get stuck in your brain, and it will most likely get stuck in yours too! Semispheres should be played at least twice: once for the puzzle experience, and then again with everything turned off, and for story elements. Semispheres is also available on the Amazon Kindle, and several other platforms. (Both Android and iOS versions are available). Fun Stuff: Controls: WASD to move Spacebar to jump Alt to interact The Switch Keys are mapped to action buttons, so I recommend not using them while playing Semispheres. Keyboard: Ctrl (Alt): Key 1 Shift (Alt): Key 2 Ctrl + Alt (Alt + Shift): Key 3 Ctrl + Left Key: Select Ctrl + Right Key: Open console (Beware: It is NOT recommended to play with a gamepad as a controller. Some of the puzzles may become too challenging for some people, so it might become unplayable.) Story: The story of Semispheres is just for fun, and isn't necessary to play the game. Press 0 to skip the intro and just go to the game. Semispheres comes with a start screen, so there is no story that must be completed to start playing.
