I am reading "The Innovator's Dilemma: When New Technologies Cause Great Firms to Fail", by Clayton Christensen, the author of "The Innovator's Solution". This will be a very good read. Anyone who has studied Innovation in any depth would find the perspective of the Innovator's Dilemma very interesting, and I know I will. "If you hit a target, you can't miss. If you aim at nothing, you will hit something" Innovation, whether structured or Unstructured has a price and with more and more tech companies getting destroyed by the cost of innovation, it seems that the price is going up and higher and higher. I think a lot of people see Unstructured Innovation as a good thing... but in reality it is so much faster to go in search of a structure than it is to go it alone. From a tactical perspective, if you have a team, especially if you have a "core" team that can take risks, the problem is as the leader you can make the decision to go in one direction or the other, but if you are building a team, it is likely that you are going to be far slower to make decisions to accept risk and if you do that, if you attempt to go it alone, you are really looking at a major ass kicking at the hands of your competitors. If you have a core team that can take on the risk, its bad for you and good for them. That said, I think that there will be many tech companies that will choose to remain the underdogs and continue to innovate with an open mind and that is quite noble and quite wonderful. I suspect that one of the problems that characterizes Unstructured e79caf774b

Some problems, most of which are paradoxes of self-reference, arise from the fact that - classically - the objects of perception are always identical with themselves. By contrast, we identify to a certain extent that.
