Childhood exposure to violence, including frequent interparental conflict, is known to increase the risk for psychological problems in adulthood. Unfortunately, many children who have experienced frequent interparental conflict never get the attention or service they need in order to reduce their risk for poor mental health and the development of psychopathology. Moreover, there is a notable paucity of treatment research on the efficacy of interventions for reducing the negative impact of interparental conflict on children's mental health. Thus, there is a pressing need to examine ways to improve children's quality of mental health and well-being in the context of interparental conflict. The current study is designed to provide an important first step in this process by (1) evaluating the efficacy of an intervention called Parenting That Works and (2) examining individual differences in sensitivity to threat as a potential moderator of the effects of the intervention. Drawing on the theory of parents as security managers, we will develop Parenting That Works and conduct a pilot study with 60 children (30 from each of two high-conflict homes) to assess whether this intervention is effective for improving children's psychological functioning in the context of high-conflict homes. Then, we will conduct a follow-up of the pilot study to examine whether the effect of Parenting That Works on children's psychological functioning is moderated by children's sensitivity to threat. We will randomly assign children to either the Parenting That Works intervention or a control intervention. During a baseline assessment, children's psychological functioning and their sensitivity to threat will be assessed. Immediately following the baseline assessment, parents in the high-conflict homes will be randomly assigned to receive the Parenting That Works intervention or a control intervention (
