In the preceding paper, various previously published observations on mange in European bison calves were examined. The principal objective of the present study was to learn more about the pathogenesis of this disease in this species. Previous work had indicated a correlation between mite abatement and antibody response, but there was no indication of the relation between immune response and clinical disease. To test this hypothesis, 24 calves were experimentally infected with about 100 mites. The calves were closely observed, and blood was obtained on an regular basis throughout the experiment. Histological tissue samples were also collected from several sites. The most striking finding was the degree of enlargement of individual or multiple lymph nodes throughout the body. The enlargement varied in severity and affected one or more sites at the same time. Lymphoid follicles and sinuses were frequently expanded, and macrophages were often prominent in the follicles. Infiltration with mononuclear cells was present in other sites as well. The changes consisted primarily of an accumulation of lymphocytes, macrophages, and plasma cells, often with slight degeneration of the lymphoid tissue. In the lungs the changes ranged from a minimal infiltration of the alveolar septae with macrophages and plasma cells, to a diffuse thickening of the parenchyma. The lamina propria was markedly thickened by perivascular accumulation of mononuclear cells. The mammary glands showed an abundance of macrophages that had phagocytosed either necrotic or degenerate epithelial cells. Other findings were a marked absence of mites, a chronic proliferative rhinitis, and persistent corneal damage. When calves were killed and necropsied at 8 months post-infection, only minor lesions were evident. The only major findings were generalized enlargement and congestion of lymphoid organs and
