The invention relates to an improved automatic prefilling machine and a method of operating such a machine. Automatic prefilling machines are known which automatically fill containers with products, such as for example, beverages, salad dressings and pharmaceuticals. Such prefilling machines generally include a hopper, a filler, a product transport system and a sensor for sensing when a predetermined amount of product has been dispensed into the container. The hopper includes a downcomer plate for guiding product to the filler which in turn, dispenses product into the container. The product is then held in the container by the combination of the downcomer plate and the valve cup of a fill valve. When the container is withdrawn, the product is expelled by means of a pump via a discharge tube. The product level within the container is sensed by a sensor mounted in the machine or a sensor mounted in the product supply hopper. In one form of commercially available prefilling machine, when the container is returned to the machine the container is placed on a tiltable track, tilted to a level position, lowered onto the downcomer plate which guides the product to the fill valve and then it is raised on the return track by means of an actuator until the product in the container can be expelled by the pump. There are certain problems with the above described machine. Firstly, the product is frequently dispensed when the container is still in the tilted track. In such cases, the downcomer plate can be damaged as a result of the container dipping into the product. This problem is particularly pronounced with salad dressing and pharmaceuticals. Secondly, the product level in the container can increase. This may occur due to the fact that after the product is expelled from the container, the pump can suction in air or other gases. This air can give rise to oscillating operation of the pump and produces a foamy product. Furthermore, air is often trapped between the container and the fill valve, which can cause instability in the operation of the machine. One type of prefilling machine which attempts to solve the problems mentioned above employs a rotatable discharge nozzle which is manually or automatically rotated during withdrawal of the container in order to expel the product from the container. This reduces the risk of the container dipping into the product. However, the provision of a separate nozzle adds to the cost of the machine and makes the machine more difficult to clean. Furthermore, the provision of a rotatable nozzle renders the machine unsuitable for certain types of container in which the product has a tendency Development of a bedside glucose meter using electrochemical sensor based on poly-L-lysine-modified electrode and biosensor for effective treatment of diabetes. Glucose oxidase (GOD) was immobilized on the surface of a poly-L-lysine (PLL)-modified electrode and the electrochemical biosensor for the quantification of the glucose concentration was established. Amperometric measurements of NADH production in the enzyme-catalyzed reaction using graphite (GCE), gold electrode (AuE), and poly-L-lysine-modified (PLL/GCE and PLL/AuE) electrodes were performed in order to select PLL/GCE. A PLL-modified electrode was prepared using glutaraldehyde and the PLL/GCE prepared was shown to have the highest amperometric response. The sensitivity of the PLL/GCE was influenced by the PLL concentration, and the PLL/AuE had better sensitivity than the PLL/GCE. The optimum amperometric response was achieved with the PLL/AuE, and the response to glucose was obtained in a range from 2.0×10^{-4} M to 1.0×10^{-2} M. To confirm the performance, the developed PLL/AuE glucose sensor was used to determine the glucose concentration of urine and blood. The developed glucose biosensor could be considered to have clinical utility for the treatment of patients with diabetes mellitus, because the sensing procedure can be performed conveniently with reduced amounts of sample.The good people of Derry, New Hampshire, have just had some troubling new evidence: We don't know what kind of car the alleged noose perp is driving. (They did obtain a description from the 911 call.) Was he driving? On foot? We don't know. "Based on some witness accounts, it was dark. We're trying to verify exactly what happened, but I'm not able to confirm a great deal of detail at this point," said Officer Ted Hamilton of the Derry Police Department. This will not do. Officer Edward Hamilton of the Derry Police Department told the area's NBC affiliate that the investigation is ongoing, but he would not confirm if the vehicle shown in the video would be considered the type of car used in the alleged incident. The vehicle in the video is a maroon Kia Rio
