past few years, a few articles have made the web rounds that, taken in total, paint an alarming picture. The robots are out to get us and unless you have both the strength and the money to stand up to them,
you're destined to lose.
The good news is that it can be fought with technology. The bad news is that it's a war you can't win. As someone who's worked with and against technology for more than a decade, I can say this for sure: If you're not vigilant, you will lose to the machine. I'm not a terrorist, but if you live on my street and you like to go on Google Street View, then we have something in common: we want to know what goes on in your house before you've decided to get rid of us.

And we're going to find out because the nature of the data we're collecting will catch most people by surprise. In the past year, there's been some significant attention given to the documents that are being collected by companies like Google, Amazon and Facebook.

The data collected by these companies tells us about the locations we go, who we're friends with, what we buy, where we work and who we're romantically interested in. For most of us, the amount of data we're sharing with the machine is analogous to the amount of information that we post online, but the computer — unlike the human eye — can take that shared information and collate it and store it in a way that makes it useful to someone else. This can happen in a variety of ways, but the most common means of data collection is by. How data collection happens is generally invisible to the user, but from the machine's perspective, the user is the center of a big machine with a whole lot of really important information. Imagine that you're a robot. Say you like to make maps, so you're walking around a really big city somewhere, taking pictures and recording GPS data in the hopes that someday, someone will be able to use that information to put together a comprehensive map of the city. As you walk, you are happily scanning the ground, taking pictures
