PATCHED Visual Basic Toolkit Setup

to make it easier to integrate modern tools and techniques, we want to make it easier to use them. for example, there is the ability to create custom controls that follow a design language, which is what is done for most xamarin.forms controls. or, there are many ways to leverage the power of the .net standard library in your visual basic code. we are also planning on adding some editor support features to help visual basic developers. these are features such as the ability to collapse and expand sections of code. other features include being able to quickly find symbols in the code editor. therefore, we are planning on adding language support for the visual basic language. this is similar to the visual c# support you see today. we will also be adding the ability for visual basic developers to add their own built-in language features and constructs. this is similar to how c# developers can do this today. we are planning on adding the ability for visual basic developers to create projects based on design time concepts. this will make it easier for them to create user interfaces and style code from a designer. and, as we continue to work on the new visual studio for mac, we want to make it easier for developers to migrate their existing visual basic projects over to the mac. we will also be adding support for generating .net native code on mac and linux based on existing projects. the final step is to set a visualstudioinstallation reg_sz key in the hkey_local_machine\software\wow6432node\microsoft\microsoft visual studio key with the value set to a path to the visual studio installer. 5ec8ef588b
