This study evaluates the performance of two different industrial extraction procedures for sample preparation of pollen and bee propolis for determination by GC-MS of organochlorine and organophosphorus pesticides. The sample preparation methods were performed with a combination of ultrasonic extraction and sodium hydroxide maceration and extraction by three different solvents (hexane, dichloromethane and methylene chloride) followed by analysis by GC-MS. The sample preparation method resulted in the recovery of more than 90% of the pesticides added to the extracts, while the detection limits ranged from 0.004 to 0.035 microg/g. The studied pesticides were identified based on retention time in chromatograms, the fragmentation pattern and the mass spectra, and quantitative analyses were performed using the external standard calibration technique. The pesticides were extracted from the samples with the same solvent and the extracts were analysed by GC-MS without any cleanup procedure. The content of organochlorine pesticides and insecticides showed high similarity in the two types of samples, while the content of organophosphorus pesticide showed significant differences between the pollen samples and the propolis samples.

Performance of the Premarin Vaginal Ring. The efficacy and safety of the Premarin Vaginal Ring (PMR) were assessed in women who were randomised to the PMR group or to a placebo group. Ovulation was blocked by continuous dosing with the contraceptive progestin, norgestrel acetate (NOMAC) which will be discussed later. Use of the PMR did not affect the frequency or severity of intermenstrual bleeding. This was assessed using a visual analog scale (VAS). The VAS score, which is recorded as 0-100, measures severity of bleeding on a weekly basis. The VAS scores in the PMR group remained below 30 throughout the twelve treatment cycles and two follow-up months. The placebo group, however, exhibited a sharp increase in the VAS score during the first two weeks, suggesting that this may be a matter of initial adaptation to the absence of menses. One of the most important properties of PMR is its ability to prevent pregnancy. The PMR
