Vega Torrent (Activation Code) Free

Automated web security scanning software from the same guys who brought you Vega Activation Code, the Java security vulnerability scanner. KEYMACRO is the fully automated, advanced, web security scanning tool that finds and fixes hundreds of web vulnerabilities in just one or two minutes. KEYMACRO works by crawling the website structure and extracting all the links. After that, it starts making connections to every single URL to verify the connection. KEYMACRO checks each connection for all major vulnerabilities and if any is found, it takes the user back to the scan. The main benefit of this is that the scan is fully automated without the need for any manual interaction. KEYMACRO has advanced heuristics which scan hundreds of websites in just a few minutes and guarantees the highest security standards. You can use the automation features in the app to scan a single URL or many at once. You can also configure the scan so it can terminate if it gets stuck. The scan will run in the background and the interface will be closed. How to use KEYMACRO: Go to the website, let KEYMACRO crawl the website structure and start the scan. Once the scan is finished, go to the website to see the details about the scan. The scan results will show up on the website where the scan was started. The scan results are sortable so you can go through the entire list and see the details of each vulnerability. You can also set it so the scan results are emailed to you or to the one who started the scan. A fully automated and advanced security scanning tool for finding and fixing hundreds of web vulnerabilities in a single scan. What's New in the Vega?

Vega is a comprehensive and efficient, Java-based piece of software that makes it possible for you to run a wide variety of security-related tests on your website in order to discover possible vulnerabilities. Considering that Java is already installed on your computer, the application undergoes a streamlined and uneventful installation process. The main advantage of being Java-based is the fact that Vega can be run just as efficiently on the most relevant OSes out there, namely Windows, macOS and Linux. User-friendly vulnerability scanner Before we go into detail about Vega's features, you should know that this utility can be easily looked upon as two applications, wrapped together into one, namely as an automated scanner and as an 'intercepting' proxy. Upon first launching the app, you are greeted by a typical Java interface that is mostly based on user accessibility and simplicity, more than anything else. The layout is as straightforward as they come as Vega's main window is split into three, self-explanatory tabs: the Website View, the Scan Alerts and the Scan Info. There is another UI element that is worth mentioning, namely the top toolbar. The intuitive toolbar helps you to quickly start new scans, stop the currently running ones, to edit the target scope and to switch between two perspectives, scanner and proxy. Semi-automated website security testing In spite of its complex under-the-hood technology, working with Vega is surprisingly easy. To put it simply, you are first required to choose a target. You can manually input the base URL or pick an already existing target scope. Once the scan is started, Vega automatically crawls your website's structure and extracts links, processing forms and running models. What is more, you can get an accurate view of the browser-web-app interaction thanks to its intercepting proxy. Efficient and comprehensive tool for testing the security of web-apps To conclude, if your web service is currently dependant on lots of user sensitive information and credentials, then you are strongly advised to at least consider giving Vega a quick try. As a web-security-related tool, it really ticks almost all the important boxes: it is cross-platform, user-friendly and it has the potential to discover a wide palette of vulnerabilities, for example, it is well equipped for finding and fixing cross-site scripting and SQL injection, just to name a few.
