In some cases, people like destinations more because they are familiar with them and have a history with the area. In other cases, it is an emotional decision to ensure that they are building a good first experience in a location. In general, if we are going to combine personal preferences and locations, we will use the following algorithm: Getting inspiration from reality So far we have talked about setting a high bar for our fantasy destinations. We have determined what we want our destination to be, and we have established a minimum and a maximum price point for the home. We have decided to hire a realtor, and we are also getting an estimate on how much our home will sell for. Next, we should take a step back to consider how we want our home to look. We discussed our home construction style and the location at the top of the article, but for now we want to focus on the aesthetics of the home. We are not home building designers, but we do have a few tips to work with. The goal here is to determine what our home design will be like. Our house will have a specific footprint, so our design should be inline with that. Also, we want to ensure that we have a limited number of design options. There are a lot of people who will hire a professional designer. By doing so, we want to limit our design options to a few iconic locations. When planning our home, we will want to start by mapping out how we want it to look. If we are designing our house on paper, we can start to connect the dots. We have already established a location and a price point. So now, we will start by filling in the interior. Most people want the exterior to be the focal
