Released a couple of months ago, the new Photoshop CC 2020 avoids the kind of major updates that come with a regular feature release. But as far as updates for the Creative Cloud subscriber, there have been a few cool features, such as the introduction of 3D Camera Raw, new tools for 3D artists, and a built-in Web browser that can host websites. The introduction of a new interface for the software's cloud access also bodes well for a future version of Photoshop. Calls to Adobe Support had said that the company is considering two new ways to distribute parts of the application or the whole thing. An exciting feature is the capability to render HTML and CSS using Photoshop's underlying raster rendering engine. If you've been working with HTML/CSS, you know that getting into the needle's eye is not much fun (unless you're a masochist). But it's not just for designers-- this feature opens up Photoshop to a wider range of people who may not know HTML and CSS at all. Textstyler is an excruciatingly powerful text-manipulation tool. Not only can you make artistic fonts (for both logos and for headlines), you can adjust the size, rotation, and color of letters, and even tags and bullets in a document. As you might well imagine, there's more to Textstyler than one might expect, and I strongly recommend that you take a close look at it. If you lean towards children's books and want to learn from just such a fabulous example, try The Phantom Carriage by Roald Dahl. The story is about a boy with albinism, and while the little boy struggles with his condition, his teacher decides to use it to get the boy self-confidence.
