Increasingly, health care facilities are managed under the direction of managers who have achieved a very high level of competence. Whereas in the past managers were concerned with the outcomes of their decisions, they now look to their managers to ensure that the decisions of those in the front-line services are implemented effectively. This move towards a more controlling management system has not gone unnoticed in the area of nursing. Numerous studies show how nurses are unhappy about micromanagement which they see as being without caring. The aim of this study was to determine the levels of micromanagement perceived by nurses. A cross-sectional, self-completed questionnaire. The study was conducted in a University Hospital, Teaching and General Practice Department in South-East Ireland. 168 ward-based nurses working in a Physio-Therapeutic Unit, an Acute General Adult Ward, an Acute Geriatric Ward, a Ward for Dementia and a Rehabilitation Ward. A five-point Likert scale was used to grade the frequency with which nurses would agree or disagree with statements related to the concept of micromanagement as perceived by nurses. Responses to each of the items were used to calculate the mean 'level of agreement' and the item-total correlation. Items rated as 'strongly agree' and 'agreed' by more than 75% of the respondents were grouped into the concept of micromanagement. The assessment of 'micromanagement' is made with particular reference to the following five items; Interfering in day to day activities, Management/Running me from one task to another, Interfering with my job, Interfering with the work of
