The basic editing workflow of Lightroom 5 has been refined and improved. Simply grouping sources in the Library panel has become more robust and simplifies many workflows. There is a new workflow that bundles all adjustments into a single Live Tile, which allows you to apply one button for any adjustment you want to make to any of the images in the current shoots. There are several workflows that are either not available at all or are significantly more complex in previous versions. The new Smart Collections system in Lightroom 5 allows you to organize your images based on the image content. The new field-based collections let you produce curated albums quickly without the need to create your own fields. This is a huge upgrade in the Lightroom power for the people who eagerly await the new features. These additions do make Lightroom 5 a better photo editor than previous versions, and probably the best possible version of Lightroom to date. This update will give you an easy alternative to Photoshop in some situations, and should make using the Lightroom 5 experience much more efficient. It is even a bit surprising that Lightroom's team of beta testers felt that this update was ready for evaluation. As I've been using Photoshop for almost 30 years, it has been difficult for me to step back and see the impact of new programs on the industry. It's true that for "cell phone photographers" Photoshop is no longer the be all and end all, but for most other photographers it is still the most powerful and capable tool available. If you want to make print-quality images as easily as possible with the smallest possible file sizes, 99% of the time, I would suggest using a digital tool suitable for the task, such as Adobe Camera Raw or Photoshop. Even on a phone, you are going to be taking photos using the viewer (and that means there is no RAW support), so why bother importing a huge RAW file for low-quality preview purposes? While Lightroom is good, it doesn't compare to Photoshop. There are far too many tools that find themselves a niche/function within the photography workflow.

We have already added many features to Photoshop Camera and we are continuing to add more and more. First the camera app is using machine learning technology to predict what area of the photo will be the subject and then apply the best settings. This makes the editing process easier for beginners and we also use a combination of the best settings to allow the user to update their edits without having to use the Photoshop Camera app 'undo' button so you can make some great edits but don't want to throw out the edits you spent time on. The real magic happens when you start working with the apps the AI has learned. Once you take your shot, on the app you can see how the AI edited the photo and you can then select specific areas of your photo that you want to adjust. Changes are happening in real time without the need to use the Photoshop app. The biggest benefit is that you don't need to undo your edits. You can then highlight and and most importantly you can apply or save your changes and go forward in the editing process and have new edits without needing to undo the previous ones you made. The other great feature of Photoshop Camera is that you can record a time lapse video of your edits and picture just one frame with every edit you do. This is a great way to see how a specific photo was edited without having to take multiple shots. In addition to the great new features we are also streamlining the workflow! You can access all the editing options with one screen including access to all the filters and adjustments, the brushes, the adjustment palette and the right-click menu. Even though there is a ton of adjustments available the screen is so large and easy on the eyes that you won't have to dig through as many settings. e3d0a04c9c
