Adobe has reworked the jump to the new native web APIs, and you will soon notice much more capable image editing with a common, stable web based preview. Likewise, the content based technologies like Content-Aware Move, Content-Aware Fill, and Content-Aware Reduce will be larger and richer. New features, like Atomic Swap, will let you import and export assets from all of Adobe's creative suites, and seamless integration of your Creative Cloud will help bring your content into Photoshop and across apps. Additionally, given that we are now moving to the future of web and native APIs, there will be more changes to the way we toggle your tools on and off and more interaction with layers, selections, and masks, so getting used to these quirks will be a small test of patience. But you can rest assured that there will be no more trouble switching between keyboard commands, plug-ins, or toolbars while editing. This new way of editing will make it easier for you to focus with your canvas, tweak color, or apply content-aware edits to layers. It will also be easier for you to read through the steps as you edit and see the in-context what's happening to your edits and how they will be saved. Finally, as these new features get more stable, we will be enabling as many of these features as possible in the Creative Cloud. With this new vision of how to edit with Photoshop, we will need a new way to communicate which features are safe to use when. We'll be putting together a range of new settings and options to help you control which features you use and when, so that you can use today's web apps with confidence and predictability. This will also be a good time to check out the new subscription model for Photoshop CC .
