I have done a couple of similar applications before. As this is the first time I'm doing it, I want to know if there are things that I need to be aware of in order to make it work with database. A couple of constraints: I need to do it all myself and I cannot use the database directly provided by Android (I need to work on it) So what I have found so far: If I make a DB with SQLite, all the tables will be inside the database file. If I for example have 20 tables in my database, it might lead to large files and take a lot of space. Is it possible to have the tables inside the app directory of the Android device? Will it be faster to fetch the data from files? I read that the best way of doing it would be to make a SQLite DB in the application, but I'm not sure how I should do that. What I need is to make a DB the user can start with some data, then later he can edit it, delete it, etc. So I need to be able to create the tables as he creates and fills them, store the current data (or I need to store it somewhere) and so on. Can someone provide me with some guidelines of what should I take into consideration in this case? Thank you in advance. A: The short answer is that database
